The peak is high. It was named for Monte Rosa by Franklin B. Hough (1797-1859), an American botanist. The mountain was known as "Tom Paine Peak" from 1838 to 1930. According to the Geographic Names Information System the name comes from an 1826 Anglo-Dutch map of North America called "Nouvelle Edition" or "Map of the United States" by J. G. Bartholomew. Its summit is free of snow on most days. The New York City Department of Parks and Recreation maintains a free zip-line cable park on the mountain's lower slope. Climbing Routes on the mountain are much less technical than the pre-HVS days. These days, any technical climbing is very limited and often requires via ferrata. Some routes are bolted to aid climbs, but most are not. There are also many webbed approaches. The mountain can be climbed by hikers on the minor trails leading to the summit, and these can be explored at any time of day. The southwest face, directly beneath the summit, is the most popular climb, and has the most beginner-friendly rock. On the east face there are routes to the summit. The upper 04aeff104c
